Midwest Construction Announces 2010 Owner of the Year
~ Industry-leading construction publication honors region's top owner ~

Chicago – Midwest Construction magazine is pleased to announce the selection of the City of Carmel, Indiana, as its 2010 Owner of the Year.

The annual designation recognizes an owner's excellence in the Midwest and was made from nominations received from Midwest Construction readers. Criteria included volume of work, commitment to community need, innovation & vision, sustainability program and reputation with industry.

Over the past five years, Carmel has consistently invested in its infrastructure to the tune of nearly $300 million. Investments have come in the form of rebuilding an existing network of recently annexed county roads into fully functional parkways complete with new curb and gutter streets, underground storm sewer systems, and roundabout intersections. With each road reconstruction project, the city has gone to great lengths to make it "fit" within the natural environment.

Also, the Carmel Redevelopment Commission is in the process of redeveloping the core of the city, and by utilizing public-private partnerships the city has made significant headway. Carmel has established itself as a progressive city in which designers and contractors understand that a high-level quality of work is expected, and one where new and innovative devices are constantly studied & utilized.

We invite you to read more about the City of Carmel and its accomplishments in Midwest Construction's upcoming April/May issue, as well as at www.midwest.construction.com.
